THOUGHT FOR THE WEEK

Today's readings centre on how best to address the problems that arise within the local church, in particular on the issue of brotherly or sisterly correction. This is clearly a delicate and often thankless task, and yet there are times when it has to be done. Ezekiel, whom we hear in our first reading insists that just as a sentry is duty-bound to warn of approaching danger, so he, the prophet, must warn those who persist in wickedness of the consequence of their actions.

If his language sometimes seems harsh, it's because the issue is so serious. Indeed, in some ways Ezekiel's words foreshadow Jesus' own teaching, as presented to us in today's Gospel. There he reminds us that we have a familial duty to do what we can when a brother's or sister's behaviour causes offence, especially when it is a threat to the well-being of the community. The first step is to deal with the matter privately and informally, in the hope that it will result in a peaceful settlement. It is far better to have the courage to speak with wrongdoers face to face than to gossip about them behind their back.

If that fails, stage two is to get the assistance of a couple of others; it will be more difficult to reject the advice of two or three people than that of one. Finally, as a last resort, the matter may have to be brought to the community; and should wrongdoers persist in their waywardness, then they're cutting themselves off from that community. This may have to be officially acknowledged. However, excommunication should be rare, and should be used not as a punishment but rather as encouragement to the wrongdoer to return to the fold. If, as the Gospel puts it, such a person is to be treated "like a pagan or a tax collector", that does not mean that the community are to wash their hands of him or her. On the contrary, just as pagans and tax collectors were a special focus of Jesus' ministry, so Jesus teaches us to include them in the community's mission also.
